

CALLING PEOPLE WHO DON'T KNOW YOU YET

A Warm, No-Pressure Way to Introduce Yourself and What You Do

You are an advocate first. These calls are not about talking someone into anything. They are a short, honest introduction: who you are, why you thought of them, and one helpful thing you can offer — and if they're not interested, you thank them and let them go, kindly. People remember how you made them feel long after they forget what you offered.

WHAT IS “THE CONNECTION”?

When your phone rings with a number you don't know, you quietly wonder three things: Who is this? Why are they calling me? And could this actually help me? A good introduction simply answers those three questions, in a friendly way, in the first few seconds.

Saying “I'm with Premier Financial Alliance” doesn't answer them yet — not because there's anything wrong with PFA, but because a person who has never heard of it can't connect it to their own life. So start with you — a real person, here in their community, who helps families like theirs — and let the company names come in naturally a little later, when they ask or when it matters. That's not hiding anything. It's just speaking in an order people can follow.

A connection is usually something simple and true:

- Local: “I'm Jessica Alvarez — I live and work right here in San Antonio.” You're a neighbor, talking to a neighbor.
- Shared community: “I spend a lot of my time helping special-needs parents / teachers / nurses here in town...” Only say this where it's true for you — for you, it is.
- Something many families don't know: “A lot of families I talk with don't realize their life insurance only pays after they pass — there's a kind that can help while you're still living, and I like making sure people at least know it exists.” Information offered, not a problem pushed on them.
- A person's name, when they've truly given it: “[Maria] mentioned you and thought you might want to hear about this too.” Only ever use a name someone actually gave you permission to use.
- A season of life: a new baby, a new home, a new job, or a policy from years ago that's never been looked at since. A natural reason to check in — nothing more.

A simple, honest way to open

“Hi, this is Jessica Alvarez. I'm a benefit specialist here in San Antonio — I help families understand their life insurance, including a kind called Living Benefits that can help while you're still living if you become seriously ill. I know I'm calling out of the blue, so I'll keep it short. Would it be all right if I told you, in about thirty seconds, why I called — and if it's not for you, just tell me and I'll let you go?”

If they ask who you're with, just answer plainly

“Of course — I'm a licensed life insurance agent. I'm with Premier Financial Alliance, and the coverage I work with is through National Life Group, which has been around since 1848. But I don't want to make this about a company — if we talk again, I'd just like to help you understand what you already have. If it's good, I'll tell you it's good.”

A FULL CALL, THE GENTLE WAY

There is nothing to “close” on this call. If the conversation is welcome, the only next step you offer is a free review, at a time that's easy for them. If it isn't welcome, the call still ends well — they now know a kind, honest agent in San Antonio.

1 — Introduce yourself and ask permission to continue

“Hi [Name], this is Jessica Alvarez, a benefit specialist here in San Antonio. I help families look at whether their life insurance would help them while they're still living, if they ever became seriously ill — a lot of policies don't, and most people were never told either way. Is it okay if I ask you a couple of quick questions? It won't take long, and if it's not useful, we'll stop there.”

2 — Listen more than you talk

Ask one question at a time, and really listen to the answers. You're learning about their family, not waiting for your turn to speak.

- “Do you have life insurance now, besides anything through work?”
- “Who counts on you at home?”
- “Has anyone ever sat down with you and gone through what you have, line by line?”

If they'd like an example, share this one calmly — and completely

“One example from our training stayed with me. A nurse, thirty-eight, a mom of three, was diagnosed with stage-3 breast cancer just four months after her policy began. Because her policy had Living Benefits, she was able to access about $425,000 of her benefit while she was still alive, to help her family through treatment. It wasn't the full amount — using it early reduces it — but it was there when she needed it. That's the difference I want families to at least know about.”

3 — Offer the review, with no pressure attached

“If it would help, I offer a free review — about thirty minutes, on Zoom, whenever suits your family. I'll look at what you have and tell you honestly whether it's fine as it is. There's no charge and no obligation, and if you decide it's not for you, that's completely okay. Would you like to do that sometime this week — or would another time be better for you?”

4 — End warmly, whatever happens

If yes: “Thank you, [Name]. I'll send you a short form from my website, southernoakfw.org, so I can be prepared for you. And if anything changes, just reply to that message — no problem at all.”

If no: “That's perfectly fine — thank you for hearing me out. If you ever want a second set of eyes on what you have, I'm easy to find at southernoakfw.org. Take care, [Name].” A graceful no today is a door left open, and a reputation protected.

The same opening, in Spanish

“Hola [Nombre], soy Jessica Alvarez, especialista en beneficios aquí en San Antonio. Ayudo a las familias a entender su seguro de vida, incluyendo uno que puede ayudar en vida si llega una enfermedad grave. Sé que le llamo sin avisar, así que seré breve. ¿Me permite explicarle en treinta segundos por qué le llamé? Y si no es para usted, me lo dice y no le quito más tiempo.”

OTHER NATURAL WAYS TO START

Talking with someone whose policy is a few years old

"Hi [Name], this is Jessica Alvarez in San Antonio. I've been talking with families whose life insurance is a few years old, because many older policies were written before Living Benefits became common — so they don't include it, and nobody ever told them. I just like to make sure people know what they have. Has anyone ever reviewed yours with you?"

Talking with nurses, teachers, and other caregivers

"Hi [Name], this is Jessica Alvarez. I work with a lot of [nurses] here in San Antonio, and something comes up again and again: coverage through work is often only one or two times your pay, and it usually ends when the job does. I offer a free review so you know exactly where you'd stand. Would that be helpful to you sometime?"

If you reach voicemail

Keep it brief and friendly, and leave it there — one message, not a string of them.

"Hi [Name], this is Jessica Alvarez, a benefit specialist here in San Antonio. I was calling to offer a free review of whether your life insurance could help you while you're still living, not only afterward. No rush at all — you can reach me through southernoakfw.org whenever it's convenient. Thank you, and take care."

IF THEY'RE HESITANT, OR SAY NO

Hesitation usually just means a person needs a moment, or a little more information. Answer their question honestly — once — and then respect whatever they decide. You never have to talk anyone into a conversation with you.

- "I'm not interested." → "I understand, and thank you for telling me plainly. I'll let you go. If things ever change, I'm at southernoakfw.org. Take care." (That's it. A kind ending is worth more than one more sentence.)
- "This isn't a good time." → "Of course — I'm sorry to catch you at a bad moment. Would another day be better, or would you rather I not call again? Either is fine." Do exactly what they say.
- "Can you just send me something?" → "I'd be happy to. I'll send you the Living Benefits brochure from National Life Group today so you can look it over in your own time. If you'd like, after you've seen it, we can talk it through — and if not, no follow-up pressure from me."
- "How did you get my number?" → Tell the truth, simply: "Your number was on a list of [families / homeowners in the 782__ area] that I work from." If they ask not to be called again, say "Of course — I'll take you off right now," and do it.
- "Is this a sales call?" → "I'm a licensed life insurance agent, so I do help families with coverage when they want it — but this call is only an introduction and an offer of a free review. There's nothing to buy on this call, and you're free to say no."

SHARING THE PFA OPPORTUNITY, THE SAME WAY

If you're speaking with someone about joining PFA, keep the same spirit: be upfront about what it is, what it costs, and that it takes real work — and let them decide without pressure. The connection is their life, not a pitch: they may want more income, more flexibility, or work that helps people.

"Hi [Name], this is Jessica Alvarez here in San Antonio. I'm a life insurance agent, and our firm, Premier Financial Alliance, is growing its team here. I don't know if it would fit your life, and it's honest work — it isn't for everyone. If you're curious, I'd be glad to walk you through it plainly sometime: the $125 to join, the license exam you'd study for, and what the first month actually looks like. Twenty minutes, and if it's not for you, that's fine. Would you like to hear about it?"

A FEW THINGS TO ALWAYS KEEP

- Say who you are, honestly, right at the start — your name, that you're a licensed insurance agent, and why you're calling.
- Call at reasonable hours — between 8 in the morning and 9 in the evening, their time — and respect the Do Not Call lists unless the person has agreed to hear from you or you already have a relationship that allows the call. If you're ever unsure, don't make the call.
- If anyone says "please don't call again," that is final — thank them, write it down, and honor it.
- Keep your words plain and true. Don't promise returns, don't quote prices on a first call, and if Living Benefits comes up, mention that using it early reduces the amount. The review, with a proper illustration, is where details belong.
- End every call the way you'd want a call to end with you: politely, and with the person glad you were respectful of their time.

After a calling session, a simple note to yourself is enough: who you spoke with, what they said, and whether they'd like to talk again — and when. Then let it rest until then.

People will forget a pitch. They will remember an honest person who listened, told them the truth, and respected their no. That is the agent — and the advocate — you already are with your Southern Oak families. Bring that same Jessica to these calls.
